A retrospective cohort study of preterm and small-for-gestational age (SGA) infants born between 1988 and 1994 in California was performed to determine the effects of fetal gestational age and birth weight on subsequent school performance. The 1993 birth cohort of the Children's Health and Medical Services (CHMS) of California was used. School districts were contacted regarding the subsequent school performance of the CHMS children. The performance of 186 children born between 24 and 34 weeks of gestation and weighing 500 to 1250 g was compared with the performance of 184 SGA children of similar gestational age and birth weight. At age 15 years, the performance of the preterm children was significantly lower than that of term and SGA children in both absolute (p Q: How to check if a variable is an array? Confirmation of the presence of HCV, HCV-RNA, HIV-RNA and the amount of HIV DNA in hepatocytes]. On the basis of the investigation of one hundred and eighty-two individuals with HBV and/or HCV infections, the results of the evaluation of 3 liver biopsies of 29 individuals with HCV infection, and an analysis of 35 blood samples, it is shown that HCV-RNA in the hepatocytes of the examined persons is a good marker of HCV-infection. The results of the detection of HCV-RNA using three different methods (c-DNA, as-RNA and p-DNA) are comparable. The presence of HCV-RNA in the hepatocytes does not correlate with the presence of anti-HCV in the serum. HCV-RNA in the hepatocytes can be detected in samples from the patients with chronic hepatitis, primary liver cancer and liver cirrhosis, as well as from individuals with acute hepatitis or from patients in whom the results of the investigation of serum anti-HCV are negative. The evaluation of HCV-RNA in the hepatocytes permits to differentiate between the patients with chronic hepatitis, cirrhosis and a hepatoma. The presence of HIV-RNA in the liver cells correlates with the presence of anti-HIV antibodies and the amount of HIV DNA in the liver cells in the serum of the patients with chronic HIV-infection. The presence of HIV-RNA in the liver cells does not correlate with the presence of antibodies against HCV, HBV or CMV. HIV-RNA in the liver cells of HIV-infected persons can be detected in cases of acute and asymptomatic infection. The presence of HIV-RNA in the liver cells does
